Lakehead University offers a Master of Environmental Studies degree in Nature-Based Recreation and Tourism. Nature-Based Recreation and Tourism is an interdisciplinary area of study that has its roots in social sciences such as leisure studies, human geography, sociology, psychology and anthropology, in the professional discipline of forestry and in environmental studies. The master's program covers the following areas of content:
Recreation and Tourism Behaviour which focuses on the individuals and groups whose participation in recreation and tourism activities occur in natural settings such as parks, conservation areas and Crown Lands; and,
Policy, Planning and Management which concerns issues such as social and economic impact assessment, market research and analysis, cost-benefit analysis and planning methodologies that support an integrated form of ecosystem management and a philosophy as sustainability.
Outdoor Leadership which addresses the theory, research and practice of leadership in nature-based recreation and tourism.
